Hong Kong: China's sweeping national security law has forced technology firms to reconsider their presence in Hong Kong. The nimblest among them — the city's startups — are already moving data and people out or are devising plans to do so. Beijing's polarizing law, which took effect this month, upended Hong Kong's tech scene just as it seemed on a path to becoming a regional hub.

Tech firms begin to abandon Hong Kong because of security law

Hong Kong's Common Law system and highly regarded stable of legal professionals have long underpinned its appeal as a financial hub. But some worry the city is becoming a less safe place to do ...
